Beginning in the early 1990s, when the New York Police Department was at the forefront of the new "war on drugs," the idiom of "snitching" became a common term in popular culture. Snitching, or reporting criminal activities to the police, was at the forefront of the war on drugs. However, the idiom of "snitching" has been used to describe any form of cooperation with the authorities, whether it be reporting criminal behavior to the police or cooperating with law enforcement to solve crimes.

In 2007, the term "snitching" began to appear in popular culture, particularly in hip-hop music. The term "snitching" has been used to describe any form of cooperation with the authorities, whether it be reporting criminal behavior to the police or cooperating with law enforcement to solve crimes.

As a result, the term "snitching" has been used to describe any form of cooperation with the authorities, whether it be reporting criminal behavior to the police or cooperating with law enforcement to solve crimes.

While there is no legal definition of "snitching," the term is often used to describe any form of cooperation with the authorities, whether it be reporting criminal behavior to the police or cooperating with law enforcement to solve crimes.

It is now a cultural norm in today's society, neither encouraged nor discouraged by law enforcement agencies. According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the term "snitching" has been used to describe any form of cooperation with the authorities, whether it be reporting criminal behavior to the police or cooperating with law enforcement to solve crimes.
